Il nous promet l'Hiſtoire, & c'eſt un haut Projet.
Il attends beaucoup de l'Art, beaucoup plus du Sujet.
Il eſt riche, il eſt vaſte, il eſt plein de Nobleſſe:
Il me ſeroit trembler pour Rome, & pour la Grece.
RACINE.

WE are told, that one who paſſes with his Party for the greateſt Genius of the Age, is writing the Hiſtory of his own Time. A vaſt Undertaking! But what may not be expected from the Ability and Experience of the learned Diſſertator upon Parties? What Candour and Impartiality may the World expect from an Author, whoſe Virtue Probity in Private and Publick Life to this Hour, exactly anſwer'd the following Character, drawn Thirty Years ago, by a Writer never ſuſpected ng influenc'd by a Penſion in Hand, or the Hopes eferment? * * 'Methinks I behold the younger in Mr. St. J—n; all that Love for his Coun- that Contempt of Danger, and Greatneſs of ; of whom it is ſaid, 'Twas not for Honour or es, nor raſhly, or by Chance, that he engaged him- in the Affairs of State; but he undertook the Ser- of the Publick, as the proper Buſineſs of an honeſt n: And therefore he thought himſelf obliged to be as ent for the Good of that, as a Bee for the Preſer- on of her Hive'—— The ſame Candid Panegyriſt any more maſterly Strokes in Praiſe of the ſame eman, whoſe Actions, from that Time to this, m them to be as true and judicious, as they are and delicate.

e are told by Lucian, that there was a Time moſt of his Countrymen were Mad; and that the great Symptoms of their Diſeaſe was, that could not forbear writing Hiſtories. But by this uthor's Leave, I hope it can't be thought an ation of Madneſs for a ſublime Genius, a young- o, to employ his Time for the Information of ity, having already given undoubted Proofs of ttachment to the Government that ſecures the Re nd Liberties of his Cotemporaries.

tho' moſt of our Hiſtorians ſeem to have had ity more in View than their Cotemporaries, at ime of their Writing, by not publiſhing their s in their Life-time, I will hope, from the ur and Generoſity of this Author, that we of Generation ſhall have the Happineſs of ſeeing uinteſſence of Truth and Impartiality during the ime of the Learned Compiler. I ſhould be he would follow Boccalini's Advice; that is, to othing but what he had ſeen, and not let it be pub- till he was dead. My Objection is only to the Part of this Advice; for I think a Writer may ow'd to take Example by Polybius, who ſays, elates all ſuch Matters as he had not ſeen, upon Credit of Honeſt People that he knows were Eye- eſſes of them.' Now ſhould our Learned Com- o ſcrupulouſly follow Boccalini's Advice, and only what he had ſeen, which, ſtrictly ng, can be only the Tranſactions of the laſt ears of Queen Anne's Reign, and what happen- St. Germain's the firſt Eighteen Months of the eign, the World, I am afraid, would harbour y advantageous Opinion of One, who, I ſup- is intended to be produced in no inconſiderable in the grand Work in Hand. But as I doubt at our Author, for many very cogent Reaſons, ot confine himſelf to ſo narrow a Compaſs of I beg Leave to throw into his Treaſure my f Advice before he has put the laſt finiſhing to his Work. I ſhall do it in the Words of e Monſieur Le Clerc, one of the moſt judicious s of his Time: They are to be ſeen in his Ac- f my Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory.

here are, ſays he, but two Things that can bjected to this Hiſtory: One is, that the Au- was extremely zealous for the King's Party, that the Paſſion (tho' otherwiſe very lawful) h he had for the Service of his Prince, may caused him to give too odious a Turn to the 'Conduct of the Oppoſite Side; and on the other 'Hand, a too favourable one to the Actions of 'the King, &c. The other Thing is, that 'ſpeaking often of Himſelf, and of Affairs on which 'he had given Advice, or wherein he had been 'employ'd, he always repreſents himſelf (perhaps 'thro' Inadvertency) extremely ſage, reſerv'd, 'and circumſpect; and often gives ill Ideas of the 'King's other Servants, either as to their Underſtanding or Management.'—— What follows is not leſs pertinent.

'Self-Love (continues the ingenious Writer) from 'which no Perſon is exempt, does ſo imperceptibly 'deceive, that we imagine ſometimes we are only 'writing a Hiſtory, when we are in Effect pleading 'our own Cauſe before Poſterity. There is ever a 'great deal of Difference between a Plea and a diſin- tereſted Narration. 'Tis with Difficulty a Man is 'brought to accuſe himſelf, and we inſenſibly give an 'advantageous Turn to every Thing that we do, and 'every Thing we ſay; of which a manifeſt Example 'is ſeen in the Commentaries of Cæſar, and in moſt 'Memoirs which Great Men have left of their Lives. 'They almoſt all of them inform Poſterity of no 'more than is conſiſtent with their own Reputation it 'ſhould know, without making any Mention of their 'own proper Defects, or Weakneſſes.'

Our Compiler cannot but know theſe to have been the Rocks on which moſt Hiſtorians have ſplit; wherefore I will ſuppoſe that he will endeavour, as far as human Nature will allow, to ſteer a Courſe better ſuited to the Dignity and Intention of Hiſtory. He whom we have ſeen but juſt now compar'd to the younger Cato, can ſure have no Dread upon him of drawing his own Portraiture at Length without Diſguiſe. One ſo upright, ſo loyal, ſo ſteady, ſo intrepid, ſo every way great and virtuous, can have no Need of drawing a Veil over the ſhining Actions of his own Life; nor over that of his Proſelytes and Boſom-friends; for the younger Cato would aſſociate with none but the Virtuous.

A Hiſtorian, who would gain a Reputation by Impartiality, ſhould be of no Country, have no Friends, nor Enemies, nor be of any Party or Religion. I own, that to be a Hiſtorian on theſe Terms, is a moſt difficult Task; but arduous as it may ſeem to others, it cannot be ſo to the learned Writer on the other Side of the Water. For as to Country, there are a thouſand Proofs that he never had an Attachment to any, not even to that where he drew the firſt Breath; Friends and Enemies were always equally the Objects of his Mirth and Satire; his Diſſertation plainly ſhews that he never was ſincerely of any Party; and as for Religion, his very Intimates admit, that it always ſat very eaſy upon his Conſcience: So that to take him in all Lights, I know of none better qualify'd for the Work he is ſaid to have undertaken.

There is one very great Defect in moſt Memoir-writers that I have read, which is, That inſtead of giving their Readers their own Characters at once, and in one full View, they haraſs them with continual Repetitions, by Scraps and Piece-meals, of their own Wiſdom, Probity, Skill, Addreſs, Virtue, and many other Perfections. Now if I might preſume to offer my humble Advice to ſo celebrated a Writer, I would adviſe him to give the Publick his own amiable Character de haut en bas, at the very Beginning of his Work, either by way of Preface or Introduction; or if he likes it better, let it be Part of the Dedication. If this friendly Advice had been earlier, 'tis probable we ſhould have had it to grace and lengthen out that renowned Dedication to his Diſſertation. And as I would not willingly be deficient in my Advice to one that writes to inſtruct Mankind, I would recommend that fine Parallel of Lord Clarendon's to his Imitation, wherein that judicious Writer blends the Characters of Lord Wilmot and Goring

'Tis true we have another more ancient Parallel drawn by Salluſt, in his Bell. Catalin. wherein the Character of the Younger Cato is drawn with Julius Cæſar's; but as I would have every Character by this maſterly Pen drawn to the Life, I chooſe to recommend the former rather than the latter. The Reader will eaſily perceive my Candor, upon comparing the Characters I recommend, and that which I hope will ſoon appear; for baring perſonal Courage and Bravery, with which Lord Clarendon heightens the Characters of Wilmot and Goring, the reſt may be apply'd without any Danger; as for Example:—— 'Wilmot lov'd 'Debauchery, in which he was inſpir'd—— Goring 'was not able to reſiſt the Temptation when he was 'in the Midſt of Danger, nor would decline it to obtain a Victory—— Neither of them valu'd their 'Promiſes, Profeſſions, or Friendſhips, according to 'any Rules of Honour or Integrity, &c.—— The 'Ambition of both was unlimited, &c.—— Goring 'cou'd have paſs'd thro' all Scruples from Religion 'pleaſantly, and would without Heſitation have bro- 'ken any Truſt, or done any Act of Treachery to have 'ſatisfy'd an ordinary Paſſion or Appetite, and in truth 'wanted nothing but Induſtry, (for he had Wit, and 'Courage, and Underſtanding, and Ambition, uncon- 'troul'd by any Fear of God or Man) to have been as 'eminent and ſucceſsful in the higheſt Attempt of 'Wickedneſs, as any Man in the Age he liv'd in, or 'before. Of all his Qualifications, Diſſimulation was 'his Maſterpiece,' &c.—— Let this Sketch ſuffice ſuch as have not Leiſure to read the Characters at large in the Noble Hiſtorian.
